

Growing up, my family moved a lot, and I never truly felt "at home" until I moved to Los Altos. Over the last decade, Los Altos is where my wife and I built a home, raised our kids, and committed to community. It's where I supported our public schools (track coach) and served our public library (commission chair). Los Altos is my home.

And when your home needs repair, you step up and fix it. That's why I'm running for City Council. I've spent my career working at iconic Silicon Valley companies, where I learned how to solve big problems: ambitious goals, sensible spending, and disciplined execution.

When I was appointed to the Library Commission, I discovered City Government lacked a common-sense approach. The city was hindered by a vocal minority against any change. They were unswayed by data. They stalled development and delayed improvements, costing taxpayers millions in legal bills. Instead of serving residents, they played politics.

On City Council, I'll deliver on affordable housing where it makes sense. I'll work for safer streets, so our kids can bike to school without worry. And I'll help our small businesses grow.

Los Altos is our home. Let's make it work for all of us.
